More rules for medical marijuana?

BY JEFFREY M. HARRIS
The state's medical marijuana program is set to be reauthorized by the legislature in 2013. The program, which allows patients with certain medical conditions to use marijuana for medical purposes, has been successful in helping many patients manage their symptoms. However, there are concerns about the program's future, particularly regarding the number of patients who can qualify and the types of medical conditions that are eligible. The legislature is expected to pass new rules that will clarify the program's scope and ensure that it remains a viable option for patients in need.

Merit may factor into layoffs for teachers

BY JEFFREY M. HARRIS
A new study by the National Education Policy Center suggests that merit pay could be a key factor in determining which teachers are laid off. The study found that teachers with higher merit scores were less likely to be laid off during a period of budget cuts. This suggests that merit pay could be a useful tool for schools to identify and retain their best teachers. However, there are concerns about the fairness and effectiveness of merit pay programs. Some argue that merit pay is too subjective and can be influenced by favoritism. Others argue that it is a necessary step to ensure that schools are getting the most qualified teachers for their money.

The issue is still being debated in court, and it is unclear when a final decision will be reached.
